fat, bearded irises that barged out of their bulbs without fail, spring after spring after spring.

Each May Day, my mother and I poked individual seeds into the ground, and then a week later we plucked out the ones that hadn't grown, replacing them and immediately starting over. By the end of June the whole crop was well on its way and the world around us was so green that it seemed impossible that it could ever have been otherwise. By July, the sweating leaves of all of these plants had pumped the air so full of moisture that the humidity caused the electrical lines to buzz and crackle overhead.

My strongest memory of our garden is not how it smelled, or even looked, but how it sounded. It might strike you as fantastic, but you really can hear plants growing in the Midwest. At its peak, sweet corn grows a whole inch every single day and as the layers of husk shift slightly to accommodate this expansion, you can hear it as a low continuous rustle if you stand inside the rows of a cornfield on the perfectly still August day. As we dug in our garden, I listened to the low buzzing of bees as they staggered drunkenly from flower to flower, the perty, sniping chirps of the cardinals remarking upon our bird feeder, the scraping of our trowels through the dirt, and the authoritative whistle of the factory, blown each day at noon.

My mother believed that there was a right way and a wrong way to do everything, and that doing it wrong meant doing it over, preferably a few times. She knew how to stitch a different tension into each of the buttons on a shirt, based on how often it would be called into use. She knew the best way to pick elderberries on a Monday such that their stems wouldn't clog the old tin colander on Wednesday, when we strained them after stewing them all day Tuesday. Thinking two steps ahead in every conceivable direction, she never doubted herself, and I figured that there was nothing in the world she didn't know how to do.

In fact, my mother did know how to do—and had kept doing—a lot of things that weren't strictly necessary now that the Great Depression was done and war shortages weren't in effect and President Ford was that all of our nightmares were over. She saw her own life as a rich life story as a hard-fought victory over being sick, decided that her children should keep fighting to order to learn to fight, and proceeded to tug us in for a struggle that

When you grow up around people who don't speak very much, you learn to be subtle. As a child, my mother had been a year in high school, the youngest girl in Meador County during her senior year. She was awarded an honorable mention in the state-wide mathematics competition. She was an excellent receptionist for a bank in
